

Sex in the 90s

It was a sunny afternoon in February when I first met Grenadine. I was sitting with a friend in a small coffee shop on Geary, we were leafing through a small book I had just bought earlier in the day.

“Variables in Sexcess?” My friend looked confusedly at me. I smiled.

She walked up to us and sat down, I put the book on the seat beside me. She apparently knew my friend from somewhere--they smiled between themselves. I gazed out the window at the street; it was only a few weeks back when Hildi and I had been here, she was still strong in my mind, her naked body lying on my bed. She made me crazy, looking up at me smiling, her eyes bright.

“So, what are you thinking about?”

I looked blankly at my friend. “Hildi.”

He turned to Grenadine. “His ex.”

“Not really, I mean she never was my girlfriend in the first place.”

She smirked, my friend laughed.

“What does the book have to say about that?”

I opened it on the table and thumbed through it. “Says I should get my priorities straight and analyze the situation. Says I’m wasting precious time.”

“Maybe you are.” He smiled at Grenadine, she smiled at me.

I let my mind wander, it was something in the way Grenadine looked at me--the eyes. I was with Hildi driving her out to the beach, we had just been to the movies, she sat close, her arm draped behind me. I eased the Buick up a hill and into some trees. We moved closer together, her eyes fixed with mine.

We had spent a lot of time together; gone everywhere, done nearly everything--needless to say I felt very comfortable with her--her presence was as familiar as old leather. Hildi had that bright-eyed look again, my attention was elsewhere and was staring off.

“What’s the matter?”

“Nothing.”

“I missed you today.”

“Yeah.”

She laid her back across my lap and looked up at me.

“What are you thinking about?”

I wanted to tell her was getting nervous about our relationship, that my present girlfriend (almost wife since we were living together) might find out. Sure Hildi and I had been seeing each other for nearly three months, before we had restricted ourselves to only going out occasionally; (she had a boyfriend as well, her fiancé as she sometimes called him) I knew we were spending too much time together, we had our steady lovers, why did we insist on fucking each other? Rhindy (the live-in girlfriend) was starting to wonder where I had been so many nights without as much as a word. I figured Hildi must be getting a lot of the same at her place. It was on this night that I wanted more than anything to tell Hildi that we should break it off but me being who I was, couldn’t get over my physical attraction of her and never could explain what I truly felt.

“I’m not really thinking of anything.”

She brought herself up to me and kissed me. I wanted to resist but couldn’t, I put my hands on her body. I pressed hard against her. We moved into the back, I kissed her neck, bit on her ear. Her breaths became quicker. She rubbed my crotch. I put my weight on her, the heat was rising, the air was thinning, I wanted to stop; I tried to think of Rhindy sitting alone in the apartment wondering where the hell I was, maybe that would be the cold water I needed but it didn’t work. Then I tried seeing her boyfriend in this very same position I was in now, it didn’t work either. I was hooked, consumed, so far into the fire that I couldn’t get out.

She pulled her pants down and I pressed myself against her; the look in her eyes, the bright-eyes, blinded me. I was inside her, moving, jerking, slowly then quickly, eating up every bit of feeling, tearing up all emotion. I felt her nails in the tender skin of my back, flesh was pulled away, I could feel my blood run, mixing with sweat and the pungent scent of sex, I was soaked, nearly exhausted but couldn't and didn't stop. As the heat became unbearable and my anxiety at its pinnacle, I felt her squeeze me, I couldn't hold back any longer.

"I love you."

The time passed and the heat dissipated, we had gotten dressed and I was holding her.

"Every time we make love it gets better and better."

I sighed heavily. She looked down and tugged at some loose upholstery on the seat.

"Mind if I ask you a question?"

I swallowed hard. "No. Go ahead."

"Do you ever, you know, feel guilty...about us?"

It was at that moment that I knew I should tell her. An opportunity to let her know some of my feelings which was something I never shared with her. But the words were difficult, the sentences hard to construct, I drew a blank.

"No."

"Oh,..." She looked out the window at the trees beyond.

I see you have invested the time and maybe the money to read this pamphlet. Hopefully, your reading proves helpful. We all find a reassuring voice tells us what's best for us sometimes; a guardian angel that looks out for us. But we don't have to rely solely on help from ethereal sources, we can look to the entertainment world for ideas; movies, talk shows, phone sex conversations, and little books that offer an endless array of sexual variations. It all depends on what you like, how you view the world and how you'd like to be seen dealing with it.

Sex is a game, pure and simple, a game with very few rules where we must find the variations and define the tact that suits us best. But today's society puts so many stereotypes on sex and relationships that it's hard for us as individuals to express ourselves as we would like to. It's a given that women bash men and men bash women and that they use each other equally, in fact, regardless of sex, we all use each other--we feed on our fear and hatred of whoever is opposite our belief system. In a difficult and sometimes cruel world where escape is required, people need a source to say that everything is all right and things will work themselves out. People need a guide to walk them through the difficult times, point them in the right direction, that's exactly where this pamphlet comes in. It takes the reader through challenges; it is a friend you wished you always had, one who stands beside you in the darkest hours. There with a quip or a fragment of advice that would help you through the toughest times. This pamphlet is here to make life just a little more tolerable and hopefully more vivid and unique. It is not without flaws, it relies on the belief and judgments of the reader, and remember, nothing is foolproof without faith.

Sex In Progress—The Beginning Relationship

There have been a million books published on how to pick up girls ranging from the simple how to get a date for the prom to a more direct how to get laid; all books on all stages of human companionship--love, lust, staying together and breaking apart. This book only focuses on the dating prospects, the variables that we all go through in the sexual game; it provides insight and not instructions, it is unique unto itself. It is unlike previously published books that have dealt with dating, it is clear, concise and far less patronizing. Maybe you have grown tired of reading about dating, I don't blame you, only people considered losers would ever be caught thumbing through the pages of "How to Pick Up Girls". Books that say you should use lines such as "What's your sign?", "I'm a man, you're a woman" and other miscellaneous bullshit. And that's why you've probably chosen to read this publication, it's a bit more direct than others on the market; I mean who could possibly follow a step-by-step ridiculous pattern of picking-up that not only insulted your intelligence but embarrassed you as well. I just hope you tell your friends about this so they don't find themselves shelling out $5.25 or more of a long-winded, practically useless guide.

The information given does not necessarily have to be used in its strictest form, feel free to elaborate beyond it. This book will not tell you what to do, it only will give guidelines for scouting. You must get your lines straight on your own (or consult previously purchased books) and follow thorough. So, if you're serious about trying out some of the variables of the sexual game—follow along.

You want to look for several things when spotting a potential partner, remember, this is the nineties and we are more eloquent in our manner. This contrasts to the aloofness of the eighties and differs greatly from the barbaric, silly pick-up tactics in the seventies; we are more advanced and a lot more civil. For example, a recent Redbook study stated that in the 90's, it takes an average of six dates to get a woman into bed. With that in mind, progress accordingly.

1. Her looks, obviously, but not just the physical features such a hair color, eyes, build and so forth. You want to watch mostly for the expressions the woman forms. This is the easiest and best way to initially find out what she's like. You have to be proficient at reading her, it gives you an indication of which path you will have to take if the relationship continues—besides, she's probably already doing it to you.

2. See how she holds herself. Is she confident or meek? (Which way do you like them?) Does she speak clearly or ramble incessantly? Does she show pride (an ego) in the way she describes things? If a woman you're talking to seems overly depressed, that could be a danger sign. It might indicate that she is either on the rebound (entrapment is inevitable) or she is prone to vile mood swings and is confused. It could lead to more problems than it's worth. But if she seems okay and you are confident in her manner, continue to run her through the remaining tests.

3. Dreams and wishes. What does she want out of life? Does she wish to have a man support her or is she determined to make a life for herself without any help? Again, is she confident? See that she lies in balance within the two extremes; do her goals seem realistic? Chairman of the board or street musician? What she wants should echo your ambitions without too much differentiation. For example, you are a writer and for a time rather unsuccessful. She is a high-powered executive bringing home nearly 60K. You spend a lot of time at home and don't even do the dishes. Trouble is imminent.

4. How does she react to you? This is by far the most important and where most males lack confidence. Once under scrutiny, they break and show their weaknesses. Keep the ego up, put on the poker face, sex is a game, keep focused on her. Can you tell if she's hot for you, lukewarm, or cold as the Arctic? It's important to note all these things, they will come into play later. With various women, it's very difficult to distinguish who's doing the talking. Sometimes at a point, she becomes interested (if this is the case then you've done well) but take serious cause to move on if you're the one holding up the conversation. The world is a big place and life is short so don't waste any more time than you can tolerate. With these four points introduced, you now have the impressions for understanding. It's crucial to adhere to the guidelines as it will make comprehension of the latter parts of this book easier. The scouting is finished, now onto more in depth reading.

Intelligent women are easier to entertain, contrary to popular belief, that more air-headed types. They respond better to humor, exchange of life's experiences and are more prone to be aware of life's shortness; frequently they are willing to take more risks. Less intelligent women tend to look for mates of equal perspective, perhaps a blonde, surfer-type who closely matches their awareness level. Quite possibly, chasing a woman such as this may quickly become moot. You'll need to rely on your patience in order to succeed with such a woman. One of the best ways to judge a woman and her perception is with her own humor. This is one of the best ways besides initial impressions. With humor, you get the real reactions of people (short of reading their minds). Face it, you can't put on a very good facade when you laugh—or smirk, If you find it funny you'll laugh a certain way than if you're laughing because you're repulsed by it. But laughter isn't always accessible; you must count on your instincts: first impressions and consequent conclusions must be set forth and subsequent guidelines adhered to. With patience, insight and awareness into your own needs and desires, you can do nothing but eventually succeed. Remember, keep your pride up.

If you've ever been barhopping extensively, you tend to notice the wide array of people there. Primarily, you might notice the many males and few females. This is a relative fact of life since statistics prove more men than women haunt meat markets as such bars have been called. You might also notice with these males, that they prance and preen around as if in some circus sideshow or a bizarre mating ritual. Absurd. Some displays of this nature may tend to offend you, you will not sink to such petty begging so you sit with your friends and wait for something to happen.

A little help. Let's say you go to a plush bar in North Beach with two of your friends. Let's also say your two friends are drunk, making a scene and others are looking at them but not in a pleasant way. Time progresses, the drinks go down, your friends are acting obnoxious and you find yourself sitting at a table near the dance floor. Your friends are prodding you, "C'mon, ask someone to dance, you never dance much." You finally give in after having spotted her; she seems nice, you follow with step one, you read her. She is a little quiet but with a lot to say. From your initial observations you assess she might be interesting, so you ask her—she accepts.

The dance was nice although you don't really like the music that was played. But, all aside, it was still fun but now you sit down; you feel ecstatic, perhaps warmed up and want to dance again but before you get a chance to ask her, a woman in her thirties walks over and sits next to you. Okay, what's the deal? She's caught you off guard, maybe she watched you dance and likes something about it. Who knows? How can you know, the book you lost $5.25 on never mentioned this type of situation. Why? Because it was written in the early 50s. This is the 90s, we do things differently here.

She starts talking to you but you have trouble hearing the words since the damn DJ is talking so loud over the already loud music. What you end up finding out through the strained conversation is that she finds your youthful looks striking, that you seem as if you've got your life together--that may or may not be true but she's has definitely passed the first two steps. You may also find that she pays you the compliment of being blunt by saying that she would love it if you would take her home where she could fuck your brains loose.

“Oh shit,” you’re thinking, what the hell next? It’s okay, roll with it and think. First, what are her real intentions in this situation? It’s obviously just sex but is that it? Is she going to harass you after it’s over? Will it end up in a fatal attraction that will ultimately cause you problems? You can decide and sometimes predict what will happen and be prepared for the worst. If this attitude is taken, you can safeguard yourself. A woman in her mid-thirties, divorced, living alone and liking it that way, is probably more apt to avoid a relationship and is just satisfied in knowing that she can still tempt the opposite sex into bed. Good for her and good for you. It is in a situation like this where the conditions for success are ideal. If it is no relationship you are seeking then go for it, but if this is not the case then you must carefully assess your needs and probably refuse her. (But seeing you bought this pamphlet and are in the bar in the first place, I don’t think you would want to avoid an encounter such as this.)

So you decide to go home with her; make sure of the usual things, protection is the key, not only with say a condom but also along the lines of a contract. If no relationship is in order then keep it that way. Stick to it, make damn sure even before the first kisses are exchanged that you tell her your situation. Perhaps saying that you’ve had difficulty in the past and that you do not wish to get into another one too soon. Tell her this regardless of your real situation; also tell her that you find her attractive (keep her interest up) but need to have a few conditions that would make the experience better for you. (Note: Blame any problems you bring up on yourself.) You may find a sigh and a look down at the floor but then again you may not. Maybe she’ll say, “So what? Let’s fuck anyway.” At this point you’ll know where she stands and can act accordingly. (Another note: If the question arises why you truly don’t want a relationship, say that you still have trouble dealing with them and prefer not to talk about it. Avoiding the point is best.)

You need to go to great pain in the beginning to enforce the issue of the contract no matter how much you want her, control is the ultimate aspect of sex. For example, after the night (or nights) are over, if she tries to keep you around and don't want to have anything to do with it, you can remind her of the verbal contract and promptly hang up--you've just exonerated yourself.

Break-ups are the worst, they tend to be showy and sometimes violent, you want to avoid all of this, make your life simple, avoid conflict. Become aloof, be firm; make sure you end it completely! Don't think of calling her three months later wondering how she's doing--this only has one end--the problems compound and become more complex, you'll find yourself rehashing out the reasons why you broke it off in the first place.

I was told of an instance where a man in his twenties slept with a woman in her mid-thirties. In the middle of intercourse she screams, "You're mine! Mine forever!" He was in shock and had trouble finishing; don't kid yourself, this does happen. But this particular man used the processes outlined in this pamphlet and reminded her of the verbal contract. As it turned out, things went okay without incident. The point is, things said in ecstasy don't always exist in reality. In other words, take events like this with a grain of salt, don't spend too much time worrying about it. If you remain calm and are aware what's going on around you, you shouldn't experience any problems and will more greatly enjoy your sexual experience.

She's beautiful, isn't she? Firm breasts, nice curves, personality to boot with an enviable life--what more could you ask for? Sometimes we date nymphomaniacs, sleep with psychopaths, and throw away perfectly good relationships. It's a wonder how we ever survive. But we do and tell others how we've lived through it all; we spend time writing small books so maybe someone else can also benefit. If only one person is helped then the goals have been accomplished.

So, take things easy, spend time getting to know yourself and the world around you; find out what you like before you try to take on another's life of problems. Relationships can be great if you're ready. Understand, women and the circumstances for meeting them may not be as exciting as you would like but you've got to hold out, wait for the right one. So, on occasion something interesting happens, like the woman who had struck up a conversation with you. It could be just for sex. Perhaps a couple nights a week of good fucking. It might be right for you. Maybe she's looking for something romantic, great. Then it might not be right. Only you can decide. Watch out for the barracuda crowd that are out to merely possess a man and use them for what they're worth--but this is an extreme case and usually doesn't happen. The basic rule, as mentioned earlier, is to watch out for yourself. Keep ahold of your tastes and values no matter how desperate you may become. I don't think you would want to wind up in the old cliché: "To bed with many a beautiful woman, to awaken next to an ugly one". All aside, do the best with what you have in the small amount of time that you are allotted.
